MANAGING THE EMPLOYMENT RELATIONSHIP IN ONTARIO

by W. Eric Kay and Andrew J. Skinner

What state-specific laws govern the employment relationship?

The Employment Standards Act, 2000, sets out most of the minimum employment standards for provincially regulated workplaces in Ontario.

There are a number of other statutes affecting the employment relationship in provincially regulated workplaces in Ontario, including:

- Accessibility Ontarians with Disabilities Act, 2005
- Agricultural Employees Protection Act, 2002
- Apprenticeship and Certification Act, 1998
- Crown Employees Collective Bargaining Act, 1993
- Employers and Employees Act
- Employment Insurance Act
- Employment Protection for Foreign Nationals Act, 2009
- Employment Standards Act, 2000
- Hospital Labour Disputes Arbitration Act, 1990
- Human Rights Code (Ontario)
- Labour Relations Act, 1995
- Ministry of Labour Act, 1990
- Occupational Health and Safety Act
- Ontarians with Disabilities Act, 2001
- Ontario College of Trades and Apprenticeship Act, 2009
- Ontario Labour Mobility Act, 2009

- Workplace Safety and Insurance Act, 1997.

There are a number of other statutes affecting the employment relationship in federally regulated workplaces in Ontario, including:

- Canada Labour Code
- Canadian Human Rights Act
- Employment Equity Act
- Employment Insurance Act, and
- Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act.

Who do these cover, including categories of workers?

Depending on the circumstances, independent contractors, dependent contractors, consultants, interns, employees of affiliates, employees from temporary agencies and third party employees can be considered employees or workers for some common law or statutory purposes.

The definition of “employee” and “worker” varies among the legislation. The Labour Relations Act, 1995, for instance, explicitly includes “dependent contractor” in the definition of “employee”. The Occupational Health and Safety Act defines “worker” to include self-employed individuals, independent contractors and temporary workers.

Misclassification

Are there state-specific rules regarding employee/contractor misclassification?

A person may be classified as an independent contractor at common law, but because of economic dependence on and control by the entity for which the services are performed, legally qualify as a dependent contractor.

A person may also be classified as a dependent contractor notwithstanding that he or she conducts business through a corporation and hires others to assist in the performance of the work.

The usual distinction between a dependent contractor as compared to an independent contractor is that a dependent contractor is entitled to reasonable notice of termination of the agreement.

Different employment related legislation (ie. tax and safety) may treat dependent or independent contractors as employees or workers subject to particular legislation.

Contracts

Must an employment contract be in writing?

While preferable for the protection of both parties, an employment contract need not be in writing. To be enforceable, an employment contract simply requires the requisite elements of any contract: an offer made with the intent to create legal relations, acceptance of that offer, consideration, capacity, and legality. Where a written contract of employment has been contemplated but not signed, the contractual agreement will be enforceable if the conduct of the parties shows that their clear intent was to enter into a binding contract. In many cases contracts are part oral, part written, and part implied by the common law.

Are any terms implied into employment contracts?

Employment contracts can be oral or written and may include express and implied terms. It is implied in every contract of employment that an employer will provide the employee with reasonable notice in the event of termination, except in the event of just cause. Other examples of implied terms are that employees will perform their duties with reasonable skill and diligence, and that they have a duty of loyalty to their employer. Usually only senior employees would owe a fiduciary duty to their employers.

Are mandatory arbitration agreements enforceable?

Section 7(1) of the Arbitrations Act, 1991 states:

“If a party to an arbitration agreement commences a proceeding in respect of a matter to be submitted to arbitration under the agreement, the court in which the proceeding is commenced shall, on the motion of another party to the arbitration agreement, stay the proceeding.”

Ontario courts have held that the language of section 7(1) of the Arbitrations Act, 1991 is mandatory and requires the court to stay a proceeding when there is an agreement to arbitrate and the dispute is properly within the mandate of the arbitrator. It is for the arbitrator to determine in the first instance whether a matter in dispute is subject to arbitration.

How can employers make changes to existing employment agreements?

Any amendment or renegotiation of the employment agreement must usually be agreed to by both parties and must be founded up new consideration. An employee can make unilateral changes to certain terms of employment if that is permitted under the contract of employment or with sufficient notice of the proposed change to the employee. Continued employment is not valid consideration for a mutually agreed variation. If a material change to an employment agreement is made unilaterally, without reasonable notice and the employee does not consent, the employee may bring an action for constructive dismissal or claim damages for breach of contract.
